Coenzyme Q10 is a fat-soluble nutrient. High-fat fish (salmon, tuna, herring, mackerel), meat (beef, pork, chicken), whole grains, nuts and seeds (peanuts, pistachios, walnuts) also contain Coenzyme Q10. Some vegetables can also provide Coenzyme Q10, but the content is far lower than that of meat.

Although coenzyme Q10 can be ingested in the daily diet, the content is not high. When eating high-fat fish or fish oil pills, some may also worry about the risk of marine fish pollution and mercury content. “Super Oil” Q10 Pure Camellia Oil Softgels (04)

Know more about Coenzyme Q10

NOVember's camellia oil softgels contain oxidized Q10. Oxidized Q10 can be converted into reduced Q10 through enzymes. The efficiency of oxidation and reduction will affect the absorption efficiency according to the enzymes in the body. Camellia oil can increase the activity of enzymes in the body and increase the absorption rate. Stay hydrated to help the absorption conversion rate.

There are about 60 trillion cells in the human body, and each cell needs energy. The mitochondria within the cells are like a power plant, responsible for all metabolic functions and generating heat. A redox process in which cellular respiration occurs in the mitochondria where electron transfer is required. Q10 is responsible for catalyzing the reduction of phosphate (ATP) in the energy generation by mitochondria, allowing the cellular energy supply system to quickly reactivate.

In other words, Q10 is a highly mobile electron carrier located in the mitochondrial respiratory chain and participates in the generation of ATP. Therefore, it is closely related to energy metabolism, nerve and cell message transmission, antioxidant response and other functions.

In organs or cells with particularly strong metabolism and high energy requirements (such as the heart), the demand for coenzyme Q10 is specially high.
